It is estimated that each night in New York City nearly 50,910 men, women and children seek refuge in overnight facilities (NYC DHS website accessed January 2014). The New York City Rescue Mission (NYCRM) has worked to relieve the city from a portion of this burden, by providing clothes, food, lodging, spiritual guidance and recovery opportunities, to thousands of homeless people in New York City for more than 141 years. Mayor Michael Bloomberg remarked that the Mission's "demonstrated commitment to improving the quality of life for homeless people throughout New York and its dedication to ensure these people lead fulfilling, self-sufficient lives is commendable."

NYCRM offers vital resources to help people escape the anguish of homelessness. It addresses the current needs and offers long-term solutions to poverty and homelessness through programs such as food services, emergency lodging and care, long-term residential recovery, preparation for self-sufficiency, work therapy and after-care counseling. Moreover, the program gives people hope and a chance for a better future.

NYCRM was founded in 1872 by Jerry and Maria McAuley. Rescued from their lives of crime and alcoholism to follow Christ, the McAuleys became servants to the homeless by opening AMERICA'S FIRST Rescue Mission, known as Helping Hand for Men. The mission, which began as a refuge for the "unworthy poor," has since expanded to provide a broad range of critical services and programs to homeless people in New York City.
